REFLECTIONS ON THE 2016 JACL NATIONAL CONVENTION AND MINIDOKA PILGRIMAGE

by Susan Leedham, Vice President

It's been a busy summer for me. First, I went on the Minidoka Pilgrimage June 23-26, and then I attended the 2016 JACL Convention in Las Vegas as a delegate July 11-14. In fact, as I write this, I'm sitting at the Las Vegas Airport after long days and late nights at the convention.

We accomplished much at the convention. We elected new national officers, including Gary Mayeda as our new National President. We also passed a difficult budget, watched inspiring presentations by an energetic Youth Council on the multiracial and Shin-Nikkei experience and attended a Youth Awards Lunch where they honored Black Lives Matter LA. We also awarded Legacy Grants to deserving applicants from various chapters for projects as diverse as a summer camp for children in Southern California, and funding an interview with President George W. Bush for a documentary on Secretary Norm Tanaka.

One of the most inspiring presentations was from Sue Van, President/CEO of the Wallace H. Coulter Foundation. Mr. Coulter was the inventor of the modern-day blood test, and so when Mr. Coulter died, this foundation was formed to fund worthy projects. Ms. Van is Chinese American, and when she learned that Asians are the fastest-growing minority in the US, not Hispanics, but yet were not getting much attention or funding for anything, she discovered that Asians are by and large ignored because of the very low voting percentage among all age groups of Asians. Even our seniors do not vote in as high a percentage as their counterparts in the White and Black communities.

National JACL received a very generous grant from the Coulter Foundation to basically get out the vote for JAs. I always wondered why since by now the Japanese American community has pretty well assimilated, intermarried and was voting. And yes, the Japanese and the Hmong are at 89%, but after that there is a huge drop-off. Voter registration and participation among the Chinese, Korean and Vietnamese is very low, and of the Asian youth, only one third are registered, and of those, only 37% vote. So please encourage everyone to register to vote and then actually vote, especially APIs. You will see out chapter participating in voter registration for APIs, and please let us know if you have any ideas or would like to help.

It’s also been about three weeks since I got back from my first Minidoka Pilgrimage. There was a large group of us from Portland led again by our own Connie Masuoka. I highly recommend going with Connie since she is fun, has a lot of knowledge, and she starts by going to the Four Rivers Cultural Center in Ontario, Oregon, which houses an impressive Minidoka exhibit.

On Thursday, the first event for the pilgrimage was a picnic dinner in a local park. It was a chance for old friends and families to reconnect, including three large busloads from Seattle!

On Friday, we all went to the College of Southern Idaho for a day of seminars. It kicked off with a very powerful film “Children of the Camps” by psychotherapist Satsuki Ina. The film showed sessions with a group of adults who all had a difficult time after their incarceration experience. They were all youngsters at the time, but they bore lifelong scars. It was fascinating watching them argue, cry and eventually come to acceptance. There was one woman who was traded as a 14-year-old teenager for a prisoner of war in Japan, and she was actually sent to Japan. There were also pilgrimage attendees who also spoke of their difficulties, but then there were others who talked about the fun they had and friendships they made as children.

The rest of the day was filled with various seminars you could choose from like stories on Nisei vets, racism, the Hapa/Mixed Race experience, Power of Words, and Holly Yasui and Sarah Segal talking about Min Yasui.

One of the seminars I attended was by Brooks Andrews, the son of Rev. Emery Andrews, a pastor in Seattle who moved his family to Idaho so he could still minister to his parishioners who were now at Minidoka. Unfortunately, the seminar was less about Rev. Andrews but more on how the family felt abandoned by their father and the subsequent divorce of his parents. Life was not easy for those who supported the JAs either.

Saturday morning, we all went to the Minidoka National Historic Site for a tour. Now, I have seen pictures of Minidoka, barren and dusty, so it was very interesting to see how it has been transformed into fertile green farmland, mainly because of the hard work of the Jas who built the irrigation system. There are buildings on site, including a housing barrack, mess hall, root cellar, fire station, guard tower and the Honor Roll containing the names of those from Minidoka who joined the 442 and MIS.

It was very interesting to learn that all of these sites were picked out in 1936, many of them in areas in need of cheap labor to develop the land and to pick crops.

After our tour of Minidoka, we had lunch at a huge Chinese buffet. You do not go hungry on this pilgrimage! And then it was back to the college where we were divided into groups with a facilitator to share our thoughts on what we have seen and learned. It was again another chance to hear from people who were there about their struggles and their parents’ struggles while incarcerated and after the war.

Sunday morning, we went back to Minidoka for the dedication of the “Field in a Day” baseball field. JACL Board Member and ONE Executive Director Lynn Longfellow was one of many volunteers who constructed the baseball field in one day, due in large part to the farmer and his family who leases farmland on the site, who plowed the field, planted corn for a “Field of Dreams” effect, and then fed all of the volunteers with barbecued hot dogs and stadium food. A picture of one of the two benches that Portland JACL donated is below.

It was also a learning experience for the local Idaho high school baseball team who came out to help and who had not heard about the incarceration. Of course, it was not in their textbooks, but that’s another article.

Baseball was in integral part of camp life, bringing a much needed sense of normalcy and lifting spirits. And the teams were very good—so good that local schools and semi-pro teams would come to play.

If you get a chance, I highly recommend going on a pilgrimage. It’s a great learning experience. My husband is Caucasian, but now he wants to visit every site we can. Maybe next year we will go to Heart Mountain or Tule Lake.
AUGUST ROSE CITY CEMETERY GROUP CLEAN-UP CANCELLED, BUT WORK CONTINUES
by Fran Sumida Palk, Nikkei Jin Kai, Japanese Ancestral Society

We are asking for community members to help us clean Japanese Rose City Cemetery. Group clean-ups have been scheduled through October, but August’s group session has been cancelled.

Since the August group clean-up is cancelled for the third Saturday, we will meet individually for August.

I go out once or twice a week to spread barkdust right now in the mornings, so will arrange to meet you at Japanese Cemetery at Rose City Cemetery. Bring shovel and pail for barkdust spreading. We have 1/2 a truckload yet to spread! We will try this arrangement for August. Groups can also arrange individually for August.

We can customize and arrange to do your family graves as well, including repainting of characters as well.

Third Saturdays for September and October are scheduled for group cleaning, 9:00 to Noon. Check your calendars. Bring a finger lunch goodie to share at the end, as we have an enjoyable visit at the end.

What to bring:
- Rubber gloves
- Pails

Please call me, Fran Sumida Palk, if you have questions: 503-810-3948.

We are counting on your TLC to energize memories of our deceased. Many thanks for the support we have received so far.

Explain how the Japanese American experience, or your own experiences in working with the community, has shaped your life.

Shaku Nesshin. That is my homyo (Buddhist name), meaning passionate heart and mind. A name chosen for me because of my devotion towards discovering new passions that develop my self-identity. As a fourth generation Japanese-American, I cling to opportunities that bring me closer to the past, while finding inspiration for the future.

When I was four years old, I begged my mother to let me take odori lessons after watching my sister's weekly lessons. Not only does the grace of the art form excite me, but my sensei is a rare treasure. Sahomi Tachibana is a 92-year-old dancer who has been teaching her craft for nearly eight decades. I feel extreme gratitude to learn about Japanese folk tales and culture from such a master. Coincidentally, Tachibana sensei taught my own obaachan at the Tule Lake internment camp during World War II. Every time I take the stage in my kimono and tabi, I feel my obaachan looking down on me with a smile.

My love of the arts has expanded past the graceful movements of the body to a life of instrumental performance. As a seventh grader, I dove into the world of jazz through the Minidoka Swing Band, a group dedicated to sharing the culture of the World War II Japanese-American internment camps through music. As the youngest member of this band, I have an extraordinary opportunity to augment my understanding of my great-grandparents' and grandparents' internment stories. I hope I accomplish even a fraction of what my ancestors did; making a better life for themselves and future generations. Last year, I had the opportunity of a lifetime to travel to Japan with the band as an educator of internment and an ambassador for youth. I hope I made my ancestors proud as I forged better relations between the youth of Japan and America in Tokyo and surrounding areas.

Being recognized in the Japanese-American community through dance and music has further inspired me to contribute through religion. As a part of my Japanese heritage, I am grateful to my parents and grandparents for maintaining our family's practice of Jodo Shinshu Buddhism. Buddhism is a universal religion that can apply to any individual's daily life as it explains the interdependence and impermanence of all beings. These sensible teachings of the Buddha have taught me to live each day with selfless and compassionate mindfulness.

This past summer, I was able to share my understandings of Jodo Shinshu with teens just like me. It was a week-long retreat that I will never forget. We were all fully immersed into our youth minister's assistant training and Japanese Buddhist culture workshops. At the end of the retreat, I was presented with my homyo, initiating me as a disciple of Shakyamuni Buddha.

My Japanese roots have become so much a part of me through my dancing, music, and religion, that I am inspired to share my Japanese culture, and hoping to guide others towards their own life passions, developing a foundation to build their self-identity.
