PORTLAND JACL HOSTS DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

Board Member Message by Margaret Lieder

Sunday, February 24, 2019 marked Portland’s Day of Remembrance observance at Hoffmann Hall on the Portland State University campus. The annual event commemorating the incarceration of Japanese Americans during World War II this year featured the presentation of a documentary film, For the Sake of the Children.

Along with the film, the program included a message from Marlene Wallingford, Portland JACL board president, a spoken word performance by Portland JACL board member Sachi Kaneko, and a panel discussion following the film. The event concluded with a poem presented by Portland artist A’Misa Chiu.

Our master of ceremonies and discussion moderator was Jeff Selby.

I know from my own life that broaching a parent’s painful life events is a delicate and sometimes impossible endeavor. Do you press someone to recount the events and recall feelings from a traumatic time in her life or do you respect that person’s wish to not face the past and relive the pain? The former seems almost cruel while the latter could mean never knowing the painful truth. As the tag line of the film says, “Some memories are too painful to remember. Some memories are too important to forget.”

The film explores the impact of the internment camp experience on several families as they try to come to terms with it during the intervening years. The viewer follows the journey the descendants take as they struggle to learn what their incarcerated parents and grandparents experienced, its impact on their personalities and how they suppressed much of their Japanese heritage going forward.

Common themes emerge from the family stories: feeling unworthiness, shame, insecurity and a

The realization of parents intentionally disconnecting from Japanese culture in a determined effort to blend in with the wider American culture. However, while European first names became the norm for many children born after internment, the Japanese family names and their Japanese faces often triggered racist words and actions from the community around them long after the war was over.

There is hope and inspiration in the film though, through the family members who found ways to be witnesses to the past and to tap into their righteous anger. Some directly represented the memory of incarceration by seeking redress, leading pilgrimages or establishing monuments at the internment sites. Others chose professional careers championing civil rights and environmental activism while other descendants in the film became journalists, storytellers and artists. All have channeled from the past into the future the energy, urgency and distress that are the fruit springing from the painful seeds of the incarceration experience.

Ultimately, what the film presents is the powerful resiliency of the Japanese Americans who persevered through the years of struggle and suffering in the camps.

They left incarceration to start new lives with little or nothing but the determination to leave the past behind and a willingness to work tirelessly for safety and security for their families. Throughout they strived to do the best they could, for the sake of the children.

The film was followed by a panel discussion with the filmmaker Marlene Shigekawa and Patricia Tsubokawa-Reeves, a featured participant in the film. Also, on the panel were two Portland community members: Leland Baxter-Neal from the ACLU and Jhoana Monroy-Espinosa, DREAM coordinator at Portland Community College, both of whose professional work with refugees and immigrants echoes all too painfully the vulnerability of groups of people whose dignity and civil rights are threatened by unjust and inhumane government decisions.

This Day of Remembrance was a moving, thought-provoking event for those of us in attendance. If you are interested in more information about the film, For the Sake of the Children, please visit the website: www.forthesakeofchildren.org.

CHANGES IN PORTLAND JACL by Marleen Wallingford

Portland JACL will be undergoing some changes. Our longtime treasurer Chip Larouche is giving up the reigns after 17 years of volunteering on our Board.

We appreciate his many years of service and will miss his great organizational skills. He will be replaced by current board member and co-secretary, Jean Yamamoto. Heidi Tolentino will be taking on the full time secretarial position.

Our next elections will be coming up for 2020. We are needing some new volunteers to help us provide meaningful activities for our community.

This past year we have not only supported activities like the Japanese American Scholarship Banquet and Community Picnic, we have also worked collaboratively with other groups with issues affecting immigrant, refugee, and other marginalized communities.

We need you to help us. You are invited to attend one of our board meetings which take place on the third Thursday of the month with the exception of the months of August and December. We would welcome your energy and your contributions.

DISORIENT ASIAN AMERICAN FILM FESTIVAL by Marleen Wallingford

The 14th annual DisOrient Asian American Film Festival took place at the University of Oregon campus on March 14-17. It was nonstop binging on independent Asian American films with talk backs from many of the producers, directors or actors in the production. This is a juried festival. The 37 or so films shown were selected from over 100 submissions. All the films were excellent and showed a wide range of stories about Asian Americans we do not generally see in the mass media. Stories ranged from a love story between a Chinese couple, both with two daughters who have problems, addiction and autism (Izzy) to a group of skateboarders, Kiere, Zach and Bing who were navigating the difficult path to adulthood (Minding the Gap).

A movie which really resonated with me was, Alternative Facts: the Lies of Executive Order 9066 which explores the politics behind the signing of an executive order that paved the way for the forced removal of the Japanese population from the West Coast. The director, Jon Osaki, is a community organizer from San Francisco. He wanted to take our history and put it into the political context of the times. Through the government’s own investigation of the Japanese American population prior to 1941, it was known there was no threat of sabotage. Our leaders chose to ignore the facts and be swayed by fear and public opinion. Osaki drew parallels between what happened in 1942 to our current anti-immigration rhetoric.

Another of my favorites was Hiro’s Table which tells the story of master chef Hiroji Obayashi who opens a wildly popular small Japanese restaurant in Los Angeles. We learn a lot about his philosophy about food and cooking and there is even a local connection. He and his wife have retired to Portland and there was a section where he was teaching Japanese cooking classes from his home. I saw many familiar community faces in the class. This film had been shown in Portland last fall at the Portland Film Festival but many people did not have a chance to see it, so we are hoping to ask Lynn Hamrick, the director, to bring the film here again.

Many of the producers and directors complimented the all-volunteer DisOrient staff on their organization and gracious hospitality. It felt like they were at a family event. The remodeled Erb Memorial Student Union was a beautiful venue for most of the films and there was non-stop food in the Green Room if you bought the weekend pass.

Another special treat was being entertained by NoNo Boy, Julian Saporiti, who opened the festival at the Jordan Schnitzer Museum of Art. His music combined with archival images helped make our history accessible to all audiences.

Next year will be the 15th anniversary of the festival. The organizers promise some extra special touches. Plan to spend time in Eugene for this wonderful Asian American film celebration.
