In mid-January, I had a taste of what I call “Japanese American heaven”. Traveling along with about 70 young adult Nikkei from across the country, I had the unique privilege of supervising 24 of them as we developed and strengthened connections to Japanese culture and between ourselves as Japanese Americans. This was the Kakehashi program, coordinated and funded by the Japan International Cooperation Center, and facilitated by JACL National. For one very full week, our itinerary was as jam-packed with learning opportunities as our suitcases would be filled with souvenirs at the end of the trip.

Our first days were in Tokyo, where we visited the Tokyo National Museum and had a few brief meetings with government officials. Our next few days were spent in Yamaguchi prefecture on the island of Suo-Oshima, known as the Hawaii of the Seto Inland Sea. Not surprisingly, Suo-Oshima also has close ties to Hawaii through the large proportion of residents who immigrated there around the turn of the 20th century. Our group visited the local Museum of Japanese Immigration to Hawaii and kind volunteers pored through records to help many of us learn new information about our ancestors who immigrated to Hawaii. Of course, a major highlight for the participants was a short homestay experience on Suo-Oshima which involved cooking (and eating!) local foods, sightseeing, and talking about Japanese and Japanese American culture. After leaving Yamaguchi prefecture, we had a short visit to Hiroshima to visit the Hiroshima Peace Museum before spending our final days in Tokyo.

While the places we visited and the things we did were impactful on their own, for me the power of the trip was in the people I traveled with. Multiple times a day, I’d take a look around and marvel at the rare experience of being in Japan with dozens of other Nikkei. This was indeed my “Japanese American heaven”, being in our heritage country, having conversations about cultural and personal identity, and making connections with every kind of Nikkei across the tapestry that is the diverse experience of being Japanese American. We represented different regional JA experiences in the US, multiethnic and monoethnic, across all levels of language knowledge, those with dual citizenship as well as first-time travelers to Japan, and with a diversity in gender, sex, and ability.

Through years of my own personal healing journey and the invaluable guidance of wise Japanese American mentors, I’ve come to embrace the belief that there is no wrong way to be Nikkei. Contrary to the shame many of us may feel for “not being Japanese enough”, each individual in our community brings a unique perspective and contribution to our shared heritage. We all belong. All of our experiences, our identities, our aspirations paint a picture of the long history that we have in America and the resilience required to make a place for ourselves in the past and into the future. And if the folks in my group were any indication, our community is in good hands moving forward.

It’s difficult to describe the incredible impression these young adults had on me. In our group, there was so much evidence of thoughtfulness, determination, community investment, curiosity, kindness, and humor. Within a short period of time, we had gone from strangers to a small community of friends, a microcosm of the support and care that thrives in many Japanese American spaces.

One repeated theme that arose in conversations about JA community involvement were the barriers to leadership, the organizational hierarchies that have dampened their voices. There were stories of unacknowledged feedback even when it had been requested, and a feeling of dismissal from some of the groups that aim to represent them. Sometimes in the veneration of age and experience, we may miss the wisdom coming from all around. And that is a loss for all.

A few weeks ago, I watched “What the Constitution Means to Me” at the Portland Center Stage. Through anecdotes, personal stories, and historical context, the play explored how young people engage with and interpret the Constitution, as well as their role in shaping the future of the country. The main character offers an admonishment toward the end of the play, as paraphrased below. May it serve as a reminder to keep our ears open, to listen to the younger voices. May we take heed especially as they draw necessary attention to things like climate change, gun violence prevention, and the ongoing humanitarian crisis in Gaza.

“Young people are not waiting for us to pave the way for them. They are out there, shining a light on the issues that matter, and it’s up to us to follow their lead and support them in creating a better future for all.”

PassinArt: A Theatre Company presents "Yohen," a two-person play by veteran playwright Philip Kan Gotanda. "Yohen" is an intimate story of the marriage and life of an interracial couple in their 60s. Set in 1987, the husband is a Black retired serviceman and the wife is a Japanese military wife. The couple has come to a crossroads in their 30-year marriage. Filled with laughter and dramatic memories, the couple work to find a pathway back to their love. Gotanda says the inspiration for writing the play “comes from the idea that yohen pertains to coloring, and appropriate to this American play where we live in a highly racialized world. And where the tradition is to focus on color.” JACL members can receive a 20 percent discount to see the play. The playwright will be in Portland April 5th for the 730pm show and will be part of a post-show discussion after the play.

Portland JACL testifies at Portland City Council
by Marleen Wallingford

The Portland JACL has been working with a group of community organizers to monitor Portland Police Bureau’s cooperation with the Joint Terrorism Task Force. There is a report given annually by the Portland Police to review with the mayor and city commissioners what kinds of cases that were shared.

Our concern has been that local law enforcement is not allowed to engage in surveillance without probable cause. That is not the case with the FBI since they were given more powers in the aftermath of 9/11. In 2001, Congress quickly passed the Patriot Act which gave new powers to the FBI to conduct searches and surveillance in terrorism organizations and allowed more information sharing among law enforcement agencies.

The report was very short and there were only three instances of the two agencies working together. The mayor and city council members appeared to be satisfied with the current agreement which allow for limited cooperation.

Fellow organizers include: Oregon ACLU, Brandon Mayfield (falsely accused of a bombing in Madrid), Portland Copwatch, Jewish Voice for Peace and the Oregon League of Women Voters.
